this book asks readers to rethink youth activism in the political field as a lifestyle whose sense goes beyond the logic of political action reviewing the debate on the relationship between young people politics and political participation it shows that a significant portion of young people are involved in more social forms of participation rather than with political ones because their references to political values and ideologies as well as their trust in political actors are weak but in parallel it also challenges the hypothesis that the various ways in which young people are present in the political sphere can be considered simply as forms of political participation presenting the results of research on young activists from radical left groups in italy the book shows that their involvement is only partly attributable to reasons of political intervention instead desires for experimentation and self expression as well as shared tastes and sensibilities that far exceed the boundaries of the political characterize their participation and are therefore a component of a broader distinctive lifestyle based on these findings the book calls for a rethinking of youth engagement the reasons for which could be largely outside the field of politics
